Adobe Photoshop CS3 serial key is a unique serial number or key.Q: jQuery if condition to see if an element is empty in that class EDIT: Since I have both classes "hidden-element" and "hidden-element-2" in my DOM, I'm not sure how to say the element is empty if it has both classes, and non-empty if it has only the first class "hidden-element" Here's what I'm trying to do: If the element is empty Add class "hidden-element" (and just remove the "hidden-element-2") Add class "hidden-element-2" The "hidden-element-2" class has styling to make it look like an older website. I want the older page to look like it has the "hidden-element-2" class, so it's semantically correct. This script will not be run on IE or anything. The problem I'm having is the if statement that checks if it's empty (in the.html() function) gives me an error because an if statement can't use a string in its expression. I realize this would be easier to make if the element is just one class, but due to code structure, I can't have it that way. Can someone please help? This site is an older website I'm making for a friend, and I've ran into a road block I can't seem to get past. A: I agree with @charlietfl and @kishan-bora, and the only way to solve the problem of a variable class name is to use if condition: $('p
