The use of neuromuscular evoked potentials in the clinical domain has increased. Knowledge of stimulus-evoked response patterns in somatosensory and motor areas is essential for improving the predictive value of surface electromyographic (EMG) recordings. To this end, a set of short-latency evoked potentials to a series of electrical stimuli of varying intensity was mapped onto the human head using magnetic resonance imaging (MRI) and magnetic resonance electrophysiological imaging (MREG). An anatomical reference atlas of surface potentials was constructed from data obtained during the MREG procedure. Stimuli (2 x 100 µA, 5 ms duration) were delivered to the head during a MREG data acquisition (128 channels). The surface pattern of the evoked potentials was measured and
